Jamie Creed is a mysterious and sexy mountain man with gifted psychic abilities. He spends his time hiding in the shadows, distancing himself from the townspeople and appears only when the need arises... only when he must protect the good citizens of Visitation, North Carolina. This recluse is a silent superhero, a legend in the town, but this time around the only danger he senses is the one blowing near, coming for him. With the intense storm comes a woman connected to his past. Faith Owen holds many secrets he'd like to keep buried. She knows why Jamie fled for the mountain cabin and is determined to get him to trust her, and maybe even to love again. This woman drives Jamie mad with need, but she also has the ability to expose the truth about him, and is capable of closing herself off to his powers, which makes for a potent and confusing combination. This gives her a different kind of power, a power all her own. But will it be enough to make him want to come out of hiding?

This is the last book in the Visitation series and proved to be extremely satisfying. Lori Foster has created a dark, intense and sensual story that makes every page worth reading. Not only does this book finally close the chapter on Jamie Creed's life, it also ties loose ends on the relationship between Scott Royal and Alex Winston. I wasn't sure what to expect from the long awaited story, but it was an ending that even Jamie Creed could agree on. Lori Foster turns on the heat in this book and makes you thirsty for a chilled bottle of wine and your very own brooding mountain man.
