Jackson Delacroix is one of Birmingham & O'Malley Press' most popular cookbook authors and chefs. When Marilyn O'Malley can't get anything but a refusal for his endorsement ad, even with a contract to back her claim, she takes matters into her own hands, arriving on Jackson's doorstep with a plan in hand.

Marilyn is in a bind. As the newest member of a small family-owned publishing house's non-fiction department, her job could be eliminated, if she can't get Mr. Delacroix to cooperate. Matters only go from bad to worse when she discovers that Jackson has a secret as big the state of Oklahoma. With the sponsored cooking contest looming only days away, both despair over their silent secrets. While both begin with a certain outlook on the immediate future, their combined efforts to make the cook-off successful brings a moment of truth, and a real, passionate love, as steamy as the Oklahoma nights on the river banks Jackson calls home.

Lyn Cash has done a wonderful job portraying that all-important first impression and just how wrong that impression can be. Experiencing river life with a Cajun flavor was a new adventure and definitely an enjoyable one.
